THE MODERN WOMAN.

XX—Women's Work for Children.

By Frederic J. Haskin.

The most important philanthropic work of modern woman deals with righting unjust conditions affecting children. "The children are the hope of the future," declared a well known woman in a recent address. "We may not be able to influence the parents, but whatever we do for the children now will help them, the parents of the next generation." The great child conservation movement, which is at work all over the country, largely is brought about through the efforts of women. Many of them have no children of their own, but the maternal instinct impels them to use their efforts toward securing to every child the indisputable rights of childhood—healthful surroundings, proper education and a due amount of time and space for natural play. When the essentials are denied to the children, the parents of the future will pay the bill.

The greatest triumph of women's work for children was the establishment

THE MODERN WOMAN.

XX—Women's Work for Children.

By Frederic J. Haskin.

The idea of the federal bureau for children originated with Miss Lillian Wald, who conceived a vision of a new Federal Bureau Idea. During the rounds of her daily work, Miss Wald found so many pitiful instances of suffering childhood she felt that nothing short of federal action could accomplish the needed reforms. She found little children compelled to work from hour to hour, at times for four, five or six hours a day. Their food was always insufficient, and often, almost poignantly, they had no time to play if they had the place. Sometimes they were even cramped by the carelessness of some person who should have protected them. Often they could be helped by the knowledge that some good, kind woman was going to help him keep out of trouble in the future.

There is a system of milk inspection which insures a purer supply of milk, and more organizations are endeavoring to see that the children who need this milk have it supplied to them. The army of baby toys gradually is diminishing, and the number of playgrounds, generally with a child-loving woman in charge, is increasing each year. The good women all over the country are organizing to prevent the employment of baby fingers upon garments made in tenement homes for the more fortunate child to wear. The little ones, thus released from toil, are saving a chance to obtain a measure of playtime which is their due.

Less than a generation ago in every city the childish offender, arrested usually for some misdeed, was brought into the courtroom with the worst criminals. Often he was thrown into prison with them while awaiting the appearance at court. Children thus were exposed to a moral temptation which frequently ruined their lives. The women of the country conceived the idea of the establishment of juvenile courts, in which youthful offenders received special attention and a chance to correct whatever wrongdoing had been committed, without being under the stigma of a criminal court appearance. Woman probation officers always were present at these courts. Frequently a boy left court to return to his home, helped by the knowledge that some good, kind woman was going to help him keep out of trouble in the future.

In most of the large cities in this country juvenile courts are now in operation. They have been obtained largely through women's efforts for children, and always are supported by the women of the community, who help with their work. The
